The workshop is for Indigenous women rangers and partners who are working to empower Indigenous women rangers to use data and digital technology to monitor and manage significant species and habitats. Indigenous women rangers will be supported and encouraged to share their own stories of how they are collecting, analysing, and using data in their own caring for country work. Participants will share and learn about best practice methods and cultural protocols that are needed for Indigenous women rangers to access and build digital inclusion pathways through caring for country programs. This workshop is important because there is a growing interest in building digital skills for Indigenous women rangers, who play a vital role in monitoring and managing country and have unique social and cultural considerations to become confident and skilled in using data and digital tools in their ranger work. Empowering Indigenous women rangers is vital as data and digital tools are increasingly used in conservation monitoring and management and Indigenous people and women have requested support to learn to use these tools to co-produce new knowledge on their own country.

The workshop will be co-presented by a collective of Indigenous women rangers and Indigenous and non-Indigenous researchers who are working together to support women rangers to use data and digital technologies in their caring for country work and build a community of practice for digital women rangers.
